

Course registration at the University of South Carolina is extremely frustrating for students and faculty alike.

One of the biggest issues on campus to me seems to be course registration and the difficulty surrounding it. Whether it be reshuffling your schedule just to try and fit a mandated 1 credit hour course or fighting through the rat race that ensues the moment registration opens, the entire process is flawed and could easily be fixed. I believe that the problem at its source lies in the fact that we just simply do not have enough teachers and classes as compared to the student population. The statistics show that my freshman class is one of the biggest classes to come through USC and I just don't believe that the campus can maintain the highest academic experience for such a large number of people. So that leaves the university with a decision, to either increase the number of available classes or to downsize the amount of students from here on out.
